Pablo Manzanelli - 25/08/2010

The technology market of the United States is in a quiet expectation. In the coming days will be presented at the American market the Dell Streak, a sort of smart phone with a larger size Android operating system from Google.

Dell bets to place your product with smart phones and tablet PCs, opening a new segment of portable devices. At the same time, it appears as the first serious competition in the market against Apple's IPAD, which has a 9.7 inch screen. Streak touchscreen, about 5 inches (12.7 centimeters), has an advantage for portability.

The Streak Dell will come with 3G technology standard and the ability to expand its memory with a micro-SD card 32 GB, Bluetooth connectivity and WiFi. It will have a 5 megapixel camera for picture and one on the front of the device for videoconferencing.

The makers of Streak ensure that it is able to operate word processing programs, send and receive emails, surf the internet and play a convenient and practical.

While at first glance the comparisons between the IPAD and Streak seem forced, it is noted that there is a bid to give battle to the device from Apple. Android are winning the battle against the iPhone in the smart phone market, but it is unknown if Google and Dell together can tackle the IPAD.

Within days, the answer will be the American public. Dell is expected to reach Spain Streak in September.
